At first, I doubted if a man quite ever
Could realize those dreary visits,
The green,
Frothing cities, and wastes of heat;
I listened to their tales of bonds
With
Macy's baraccazo to the prairies
of the West,
And the many such talk to seem Pain for me
This dreary land of lone industry.
—Waldred Eggleston.

The restless sea shall call me more,
As oft she called with trembling
sigh,
Through dark and perilous days
of year,
And when sobbing wind shall blow
Over the souls of men whose eyes
Have known her treacherous importunity.

The wind is very mild and slow,
The clouds obey his will,
They pass and pass and never go, Trailing in their wake still Tis very sweet to be alive
On a morning that's so fair;
For nothing seems fair or strong
In the unbroken air.

All day we sat in a clearing, under the tall pines.
Holding the leash of the runaway horses in our hands.
Sometimes we closed our eyes and offered vague guesses
What was the voice of the lake at our feet.
And then there was the cry of the mol liquid poplar—
That music of water.

The rattle on the pavement-blacks
Don't you cry,
A handcart and a carriage like Fees an' brennons fly;
Ten thousand people bawling wild,
Makin' a noise like a dog baying, An' to think I left me friends in old Kilkenny!

—Foster Dallard

Gems of the mountain pine,
White of the snow;
Grey walls of weathered stone
And the snow-covered pine.
Thrill of the dirty skin
Skimming the snow,
Leaping the drifts to ease
Down the pines.

—Wilfrid Eggleston
